In the shadowed alleys of Beirut's southern suburbs, where cobbled paths twist between crumbling concrete and emerald resilience, there exists a street not marked on any city map—yet etched deeply into the memory of those who lived through its evolution. "Where the streets had a name" is not a metaphor here; it is a testament to a place where identity, violence, memory, and survival converged. This is the story of Randa Abdel Fattah—a woman whose name became inseparable from the very arteries of a neighborhood reshaped by war, displacement, and the quiet persistence of community. Randa Abdel Fattah was born in 1978, just as Lebanon's civil war was drawing to a brutal close, her infancy steeped in the chaos of a fractured city. Her childhood unfolded in the narrow, winding lanes of Burj Hammoud and later, the reconfigured zones of Dahiyeh, the southern stronghold of Hezbollah. But it was not her birthplace, but the transformation of its streets—once unnamed thoroughfares—that became the silent narrator of her life. These streets, unmarked by official signage yet pulsing with daily struggle, became a canvas for geopolitical shifts, economic desperation, and the intimate human cost of conflict. The origins of these streets are rooted in the 1943 National Pact, Lebanon's foundational agreement that allocated urban space along sectarian lines, a system that, by the 1970s, had ossified into territorial enclaves. Dahiyeh, initially a rural hamlet, was absorbed into Beirut's urban sprawl amid the civil war's escalation. As violence displaced hundreds of thousands, makeshift neighborhoods sprang up—unplanned, unregulated, and unnamed. Randa's early years were spent in this liminality, where the name of a street was not inscribed in stone but whispered through generations, layered with migration, memory, and survival. By the late 1980s, Dahiyeh had become a de facto Hezbollah stronghold, its streets fortified not just by concrete but by ideology and survival. The urban fabric was redefined by aid flows from Iran, reconstruction efforts funded by transnational networks, and the slow return of displaced families seeking shelter. It was in this context that Randa Abdel Fattah emerged—not as a political figure, but as a chronicler of the everyday. A journalist by vocation, she began documenting the street’s shifting identity: how a dirt
